From the Atlantic the Pacific Ocean is entered either by the West after doubling Cape Horn, or by the East on doubling the Cape of Good Hope. In this latter case the Indian Ocean must be crossed to reach the Pacific, and one of the numerous straits adopted which connect the two seas; or the course South of Australia. In continuation of the subject of the routes for crossing the Atlantic as well as the Indian Ocean, those for the Pacific by the East or West are here explained according as the ship is bound to the eastern coasts of Asia, Australia, or a port in the western Pacific, or whether that may be in its eastern part on the coast of America. These remarks will be followed by those on the principal routes for crossing the Pacific Ocean, and from which others may be easily deduced. It will be convenient to divide the subject into, --1st.--Routes from the American ports to China and Australia and back; also routes from India or China to the East coast of Australia and back. 2nd.--Routes from India and China to Australia by Torres Strait, . with instructions for its navigation, and the eastern coast of Australia and back by Torres or Pitt Straits. 3rd.--The navigation of the western coast of America. First Part. From the West Coast of America to Manila or Macao.--There are two great routes from the western coast...
