Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Results of the Third Joint Us-USSR Bering Chukchi Seas Expedition (Berpac): Summer 1988 In the last few years, an ever-growing anthropogenic impact on different natural ecosystems and the adverse effects resulting from this impact have led humanity to realize the real threat of potential global ecological disasters and to give a high priority to environmental protection. Natural factors cause the bulk of nearly all man-made chemicals to eventually enter the World Ocean, which, owing to this, can be considered a tremendous reservoir/accumulator of contaminants. Elimination of these contaminants through natural processes of the ocean (i. e. self-purification) occurs through a complex system of physical, chemical, and biological processes taking place in the ocean. However, conditions favorable for the existence of certain hydrobionts that were established over whole geological epochs are being disturbed by these anthropogenic impacts. For these reasons, it is obvious that while studying ocean pollution and its ecological consequences, it becomes necessary to have complex physical, chemical, and biological investigations, which calls for principally new, interdisciplinary approaches to the solution of this problem....
